From the frontier district between Nisch and Alexinatz come now similar tidings to those I telegraphed the other day as having been sent by Alempics from the western frontier about Bellina. No man who is not obstinately determined to be incredulous can question the truth of these statements. Officers and soldiers who come down from the front authenticate them with tales of burnt villages which they have seen, the mangled bodies of children lying in the guttars among the charred debris, headless trunks of Servian soldiers in places where there has been fighting, men in the up-country hospitals, with noses slit by knives as they lay helpless from their wounds. In the course of an afternoon's ride I vesterday found my way into a little one of the houses in which there was a SUMAC WANTED. group of women and children, with here and there an old man-all the able-bodied men are away to the war. On the settle under the projecting caves, there set a woman, draggled, miserable, and forlorn, with a boy about twelve years old standing by her side; and around them the people had formed a semi-circle, and were looking on with a strange concerned patience of silence. The woman, too, was silent; she sat there in an apathetic reverie of despondency, with her eyes on the of the women whispered something to my companion, a Serbian officer, whose face flushed, and whose mouth set sternly at the low recital. Not surely the less did this Sclave woman quiver with the agony of her involuntary degradation because she told us of it—here before the people—with shrill voice and flashing volubility of utterance. Her cottage had been burnt before her eyes; of three children she had seen one-her babytossed about from soldier to soldier, and then flung into the flames; of the second she knew nothing; the third, the lad who was now with her had made his escape timeously, and joined her, from out the cover of a wood after she had been allowed to drag herself away from the seene of devilry. Her relatives lived, she said, in one of the hamlets of the golubinge upland, and she had tramped thus far on her way to shelter herself among them. Her husband had left for the army since the carliest days of the war, and she knew nothing of his whereabouts. Their cottage had been on the upland near the Grumada Pass.
